The Spectral Monk

The celebrated tavern of the Pomme d'Ève was situated in the University, where the Rue de la Rondelle met the Rue du Bâtonnier. It was a vast ground-floor room, with a very low, vaulted ceiling whose central springing rested on a huge wooden pillar painted yellow; tables everywhere, gleaming pewter hanging from the wall, never any shortage of customers, girls by the score, a glass front on to the street, a vine by the door, and above this door a gaudy metal plate, decorated with a woman and an apple, which had gone rusty in the rain and swung in the wind on an iron hinge-pin. This sort of weathercock overhanging the pavement was the inn-sign.

Night was falling. The crossroads was in darkness. From a distance, the tavern full of candles blazed in the shadows like a forge. Through the broken window-panes came the sound of glasses, of carousing, of swearing and quarrelling. Through the mist formed by the heat of the room on the glass front, dozens of blurred figures could be seen milling about, from whom there now and again came a resounding shout of laughter. The passers-by did not look in through those turbulent window-panes as they went about their business. Except, from time to time, when some small ragamuffin stretched up on tiptoe to the window-rail and hurled into the tavern the mocking old cry with which drunkards were then pursued:

'Halloo, halloo, you're boozy.'

Yet one man walked imperturbably to and fro past the rowdy tavern, who looked in constantly and strayed no further from it than a pikeman from his sentry-box. A cloak was pulled up round his eyes. This cloak he had just purchased from the ol[illegible] man next door to the Pomme d'Ève, no doubt to [illegible] chill of a March evening, or perhaps to conce[illegible] From time to time, he stopped in front of th[illegible] with its lead lattice-work, to listen, to wat[illegible] his feet.
